"World's Top Personal Trainer" challenges the fitness industry

What is it?

During her 20-plus year career, personal trainer Joanne “Jo” Blackerby has watched the multi-billion dollar fitness industry promise to change bodies and lives with the latest-and-greatest program—and fail, repeatedly.

Why? Because there is no “one-size-fits-all” training program or method. Behind every goal, challenge and obstacle there is a person with a unique web of personal experiences striving to accomplish what they desire.

Joanne, who was named “World's Top Personal Trainer” by LifeFitness, says that when clients walk into Spirit Fitness, her gym in Austin, Texas, they end up trusting her with more than just their bodies—they reveal emotional issues, family dysfunction, and other challenges in their personal lives. Joanne uses the tenets of a fitness program—Overload, Specificity, Endurance, Flexibility, Strength, Power and Balance—to take training beyond physical fitness and impact her clients’ attitudes, health and spiritual wellness. As Joanne says, “I train bodies for a living. I train bodies for life.”

In her memoir, Training Effects: Reflections on the Art of Personhood Training (June 2014), Joanne interweaves the principles of fitness with stories of how training has helped her clients to contend with life’s obstacles. She also shares her story of how exercise and her career as a personal trainer has helped her overcome her own challenges: fleeing her home country of Jamaica for Canada then the United States, managing ADHD and depression, and balancing life as a wife, mother, and female fitness professional.

Joanne teaches her clients and personal trainers to “recognize that training the body for fitness comes through acknowledging and working with each person’s entire self.” In their quest to be physically healthy and strong, her clients find their fitness training impacting every aspect of their lives. The trainer’s role in that relationship is to guide, educate and support their clients in caring for their health and wellness. Joanne challenges those in the fitness industry to hold themselves to a higher level of responsibility and professionalism, because “personal training is first and foremost personal.”

Why is it important?

Millions of people invest in “Body by [insert workout, trainer, DVD, television show, brand, diet]” in a relentless and obsessive dash to stronger, smaller, bigger, thinner, faster and better but ironically, the industry’s success depends on the failings of its members.

As one of 800 wellness professionals worldwide to hold the American Council on Exercise Advanced Health and Fitness Specialist Certification (ACE-AHFS), Joanne is committed to the education of her clients and fellow trainers. Joanne urges the exercise industry to set aside cookie-cutter workouts and perpetual program sales at the expense of genuine progress for those it serves. As one of her clients said, “I am six feet four inches, and I weigh three-hundred pounds. I knew something wasn’t right when I was paying for the same workout as the sixty-year-old woman beside me.”

Training Effects offers a telling prescriptive for the personal training industry and how it can more effectively fulfill the aims of its clients as well as the profession.
